What, then, are the conditions First, a bit of decent land, if possible, near a stream or other water, within reasonable distance of a house, in case milk and possibly some other stores are necessary. Selecting a Site. --209. --The selection is often made before examination is possible. We may carry occasionally in our pocket a list of probable Camping sites, but that is an exception rather than a rule. The best method, at any rate, is to select your land first, and then get permission. If you are certain it is a place where permission is not needed, well, there is your land, take possession and take the consequences. That gentlemanly demeanour, politeness, and civility of yours, with an offer of payment, ought to satisfy any reasonable demand. A good deal of the unpleasantness that happens to the campist trespasser arises through a too hasty word, too stiff a back, a nose too high, or else by the utterly ragamuffin and shabby appearance of the comfortable old clothes we wear when Camping. In Ireland, for instance, I have been often half refused because I have been taken for a pedlar, a circus outrider, an exciseman, a bill poster, a political spy, a railway surveyor, a poacher, a wandering shoemaker, a tinker, and even a beggar. This is, of course, by the comparatively poor, untravelled, and...
